

Teaching Ethics in Global Business Courses

A Search for Best Practices

Sara Gibson
School of Management and Business
St. Edward's University, Austin, Texas 78704
sarag@stedwards.edu

Abstract

St. Edward's University School of Management and Business is committed to providing its students with a comprehensive business education that includes both a global perspective and one that equips them with the ethical tools they will need as they confront inevitable, value-laden business dilemmas. This symposium provides an overview of the content of two courses, one designed for undergraduate students and one designed for graduate students, which expose students to some important elements of ethical decision making in the context of international business.

Following the presentation, the speaker will engage the audience in discussion to generate a dialogue about current practices at other institutions and will seek to distill a consensus about best practices in teaching global business ethics.